The alleged rape charged against veteran broadcaster, Kwasi Kyei Darkwa (KKD) has been buzzing in the media within Ghana and beyond.

While many have shared their varied opinions, and more women have 'come out' to accuse KKD of similar assaults, some celebs have been talking on social media.

Big Brother Africa star turned singer, Mimi Divalish took to twitter to vent, slamming KKD for among other things admitting and having sex with a 19 year old girl.

Meanwhile Yvonne Nelson appears to have subtly waded into the ongoing KKD saga with just a tweet – a witty one – for the matter. She didn't have to write a long thesis – the whole view travelled eight words – "Karma is a b***h. Little did he know". And she didn't have to add that it was KKD she was referring to. There is some history to this. KKD is one of the people who have asked Miss Nelson to come clean on her complexion. He thinks she's bleached. She's had to deny his claim and that of others.

If you were waiting for the outspoken Lydia Forson to say anything on the subject, then you are in for a disappointment. She wrote on her Facebook page the following:

A lot of people are on my case for not publicly giving my views in this issue. First of all, I'm not obligated to always have an opinion about everything, and even if I do, I'm still under no obligation to share it.

In this case especially where it's extremely sensitive, I have to proceed with caution.

I never write unless I'm absolutely sure of what I want to say. Contrary to what people may say, I don't have the "I need to comment on every issue to stay relevant" syndrome.

I empathize with the victim if it's true, and understand what she may be going through, trust me I do. And I know many other women have and continue to suffer in silence. It is a very frightening road that many have had to walk alone due to the shame and public persecution that often comes out of speaking out.

To the alleged offender, I equally sympathize, because there's nothing worse than a false accusation. I have also been there, where you're judged before you're given the chance to say your side. The damage some of these allegations can do is irreparable.

Either way someone's life will be ruined forever because of this.

So I don't want to talk about the "alleged" victim or the "alleged" offender in question. I'll let the police and investigators do their job. Because to be fair, regardless of what anyone may say we weren't there and no matter how much we may hate or love any of the people involved in this case only the two backed by concrete evidence can actually tell us the truth.

I'd rather talk about something else in relation to this.

Let's talk about our attitude towards the whole idea of "rape". How we react to the victim, the offender and the events leading up to the "act".

Rape is a very difficult subject which can start a long debate. It isn't about how the victim looks, his/her willingness to be in the presence of her attacker, his/her background, his/her lifestyle or his/her past. It's basically boiled down to consent. And even in that a victim can say yes, and has the right to change his/her mind. If by making that known to the person, he/she proceeds to force himself/herself on the other party, it's RAPE.

Now I understand how confusing this maybe, trust me, even for the victims themselves they often question if they have been raped or not due to some of these factors.

A lot of their attackers, in most cases genuinely believe it was consensual, because the big question often put out there is "why were you in his/her presence"? (Watch for Coloured Girls)

Especially in a society where no, always means a maybe, or a slow yes, or a I really want to do this but I don't want you to think I'm a slut so I'll say no, but hope you'll push further until I have no choice but to agree, yes.

The statements from some of you, especially the "educated" "know it all" "social media activists" and "I have the need to be heard" people is not only frightening but sad. You would think we would be more objective and less sentimental.

I've always argued that if you get in trouble in the country, your sentence basically boils down to whether people like you or not.

If you're liked, your actions will be justified.

If you're not liked, let's just say you will be sentenced to public court, tried, convicted and completely humiliated to the point that prison will seem like a luxury.

So lesson here... Make sure you're liked at all cost.
